

FUNERAL DIRECTORY

Help at a very difficult time

ANY death, sudden or expected, has a profound effect on family and close friends.

At this time of grief, organising a major event like a funeral is the last thing you need, along with having to sort out bank accounts, a will and notifying everyone of the death. This is where a good funeral director is worth his or her weight in gold to take the strain off immediate family members. A good funeral director will immediately step in to take charge of all the necessary arrangements for the funeral. He or she will first of all organise a suitable date, and then take details for an announcement in the local newspaper so everyone knows the date and time of the funeral service.

You will also need to decide on the type of flowers, the coffin, the music and order of service.

Remember you will also need to organise some refreshments for after the service so that those attending can have something to eat before returning back home.

A lot of local hotels, restaurants and pubs cater for funeral parties but again, your funeral director will have details.

Let your funeral director help as much as possible at this difficult time.

Once the funeral is over and things settle down, you can then begin to think about sorting out financial accounts, the will and even personal belongings of the deceased. There is normally no rush to sort these out, just take it one day at a time.
